THREE THINGS TO KNOW

1. Urban planners must prioritize localized climate adaptation and watershed coordination to safeguard rapidly expanding cities.
2. Nepal has proposed uniting regional rivals India and China to tackle mounting climate threats in the Himalayas.
3. The International Energy Agency has reduced its global oil demand forecast due to escalating fuel prices and economic uncertainty from the conflict in Iran.

Urban Renewal Must Emphasize Climate Adaptation, Expert Urges

Urban planners should prioritize localized climate adaptation and watershed coordination over simple disaster relief cycles to safeguard rapidly expanding cities.

- Climate adaptation centers on protecting humanity and requires localized strategies rather than uniform global benchmarks. [global.chinadaily.com.cn]

  > "Climate adaptation focuses not on halting global warming but on protecting humanity."

- Public funding is essential for climate adaptation because disaster infrastructure does not produce commercial revenue. [global.chinadaily.com.cn]

  > "Both domestic and international practices indicate that public financing remains the primary source of funding for climate adaptation."

- Fast-growing new urban districts face greater disaster vulnerability than historic settlements that adapted over centuries. [global.chinadaily.com.cn]

  > "In contrast, newly developed urban areas and districts, often rapidly developed, lack historical resilience and are more vulnerable to disasters."

- Uncoordinated drainage systems can cause watershed disasters when upstream areas discharge water too quickly downstream. [global.chinadaily.com.cn]

  > "Rapid drainage upstream shifts the pressure entirely downstream, leading to disasters at the watershed level."
